

For the first time a clock that electricity winds

ELECTRICALLY WOUND

NOBODY expects a clock to be right!

Most houses are full of clocks that guess at the time. Many houses are full of clocks that have tired of guessing . . . and stopped.

Modern life takes it for granted that you have to reset a clock whenever you wind it.

Yet here's a clock guaranteed accurate as a railroad watch . . . accurate within 30 seconds a week . . . guaranteed to stay so without winding.

What kind of a clock is this? Its movement is a clock movement. Its gears are chronometer gears. Its escapement is a watch escapement. And its mainspring is wound by a small precision motor built into the movement.

The Sangamo (electrically wound) Clock is attached to any convenience outlet or light socket (alternating current). Plug it in as you would a lamp.

The current starts the motor. The motor winds the mainspring, and thereafter keeps it at uniform tension. This gives it an accuracy superior to that of ordinary clocks.

Never does a Sangamo (electrically wound) Clock need handwinding. Current interruptions do not stop it. The operating cost is about fifty cents a year. It acts as a master clock for the whole house.
