INDIAN SUMMER

SOLDIER COWBOY

RIDING DUDE

Author: WINNIFRED EATON REEVE, author of published novels, "Cattle", "His Royal MLbs", "The Man from the North" and others.

Open upon beautiful shot of cattle country. Rolling hills and meadows, woods and a river. Long files of cattle are pouring over the hills, riders flanking lines on either side and riding ahead and behind the army of moving cattle.

From vantage point on hill group of five men watch the passing cattle. One has a field glass, another squints through shaded eyes. Another is Ed Minton, Agent of the Stoney Indian Reserve. He has a narrow sinister face. The men with him are sheepmen. Minton is the new Agent of the Reserve. The sheepmen are up from another state, which has suffered heavily from the prevailing drought.

Minton explains that the T Bar T cattle (passing) have had the right of range over the Indian Reserve by an unwritten agreement between the owners of the outfit and the Indians. They share fifty fifty the annual increase of the cattle, and the tribe have grown rich, while the T Bar
