

where she proceeds generously to share her precious gin with all the tramps. Presently she reaches a querulous stage, and when one of the two greedy tramps drinks longer from the bottle than Mrs. O'Rourke thinks is right, she bangs him on the head with the other bottle. Instantly a free for all fight follows. Into this the police charge. Mrs. O'Rourke, fighting, scratching, kicking and pleading and whining, is shoved into a police wagon and carried off. She is given ten days at Blackwell's Island.

In the apartment house all is hustle and bustle. Lily Belle has been despatched for new clothes for the children. Dickie and Birdie meanwhile have their hands full with the twins. They crawl under and over everything; they are all over the place, upset the ink, dump the garbage pail in kitchen, knock over glasses, squirt the seltzer bottle freely, climb out on the fire escape and crawl over ~~xx~~ on the perilous railing to tap at tenant in adjoining apartment, and getting into one hair raising scrape after another. Finally the desperate Daytons attempt to punish them, with the result that Maurice, wriggling out of the weak hands of the chastising Dick puts up a tremendous fight, kicking his shins and biting him, while Patrice opens her mouth wide, and sets up the most alarming and deafening outcries.

The people in the apartment above thump on floor. Windows are thrown up in courts and irate tenants telephone down to know what all the infernal noise is about. Babies are not allowed at the Monster, and the Daytons vainly try to stop