

Some of his men are being chased by steers. An aged bull causes consternation among the soldiers. Everything is done to harass them. Galloway gathers a bunch of cattle together and is riding with them, when Polly and some Indian boys start a terrifying Ki-ri-ing and hooting, and come tearing down toward the bunch. This causes a scattering stampede. One of Galloway's men is thrown and prampled upon. Polly rides up.

Galloway denounces her. Tells her she is to blame. As the young soldier is carried to one side, Galloway tells Polly she is under arrest.

She laughs scornfully in his face, sticks her spurs in to the flanks of her cow pony and is off.

Galloway takes after her.

She gives him a wild chase. She knows the woods and canyons and every inch of the country. She disappears out of sight in a coulie. A few minutes later, we see Polly, on horse, swimming across the river to the south side, while Galloway is still seeking her on the opposite side.

The sheep men and Minton conferring. ~~Mintonx~~
They connive to slip the sheep through. Once on the range it will be hard to dislodge them. A spy however tells Minton that the T Bar T have stolen a march on him, and that their cattle are already on the South side of the River. Minton is wild with rage.

The sheep are seeping through. Troopers hold back the enraged cow men. Galloway has returned. As
